This is a short animation I created as an introduction to the soft-toric phase of crown lengthening (you know, when the crown of your tooth is lifted so that the tooth is the same size as the neighboring teeth and then the gum can pull it back together early and fully). There are two types of soft-toric phases: cervical and apical. They are both done in the lab, but I will only be discussing the apical soft-toric phase because it is the more visible phase. The first step is to determine where the tooth will be placed on the arch and then how high it needs to be lifted (high lift equals small or none show at all, medium lifts are medium show at all, and low lifts are large show at all). This does take time and does have the potential to cause some bleeding, but this is the "beginner" version and can be done at home 1d6a3396d6

A: This is a great resource that shows the difficulty in programming languages and how they differ, and also the strengths and weakness of each language.
