Q: Theoretical Limit of Bitcoin to USD Reading Bitcoin's price, I got to know that the price of Bitcoin is calculated according to USD per BTC. For example, if I take 4 BTC, the price will be $20. Now, just making sure that the bitcoin price is not fluctuating that much, what is the theoretical maximum price of Bitcoin, given that the USD price is constant? In other words, will the USD price of Bitcoin always be there, whatever the number of BTC will be? A: No, in fact the rate will fluctuate when the price fluctuates. There's no "constant" rate anywhere in the system, and it is possible to see the rate very clearly even though it is hidden in a dark market. The rate it "supposed" to have is 6m/BTC and fluctuates between 6m/BTC and 5m/BTC, every time when the price of bitcoin increases, the rate will go up, and vice versa. What you see is just the average rate. The correct rate 6m/BTC is stored on the blockchain and has been verified by more than 1000 nodes, and the difficulty of the block that store the average price is equal to 0.000005 BTC every minute.
