The 8 user.Wednesday, May 11, 2014 HTC Vive, the latest entry-level Windows Mixed Reality headset, has recently emerged into the market and since then, it has made a good enough impact to cause a stir in the mixed reality. With the HTC Vive, one can get a reasonable experience, but the company has faced many problems, including the headset being way too expensive, the VR software support being low, the fact that the VR content is not available on a widespread scale, along with the poor factor of the headset making it uncomfortable. Two years ago, Oculus VR emerged from a startup company, and since then, the virtual reality has been on a fast track to becoming a hot topic, and Oculus VR has been leading the charge with the release of the new hardware and software, which has been touted for its quality and graphics. However, all said and done, it's safe to say that the HTC Vive is catching up and is starting to do things that the Oculus Rift didn't do before, with a smaller price tag, lower production costs, and great quality. Now, it's clear that all the VR headsets launched over the last two years are a result of the successful port of the SteamVR platform, which is still being developed by Valve, along with some other developers. During the SteamVR announcement, Valve said that it was looking forward to giving the users an all-in-one, cheaper and better VR solution, and the company seemed pretty satisfied with the response of the SteamVR. In fact, Valve also said in its blog post that SteamVR is "becoming a true platform for VR hardware." However, no VR headset without SteamVR would be able to get a lot of traction and that's something that HTC Vive has managed to do. Some may say that the fact that a VR headset without SteamVR, such as the HTC Vive, can make as much of an impact as it has, indicates a poor quality and lack of trust from the manufacturers, but it
