I suspect the real motive to the Obama administration's medical and nonmedical side exists not in a desire to help those suffering from the fact of the existence of the denial of Obamacare, but in a desire to protect the stature of Obama's legacy and to protect his wife's place in the continuum of power, an achievement which very well may be earned in part by hurting those who suffer through the consequences of Obamacare. I mean, really, this is pretty sad stuff. For a while it seemed that the people that are suffering because of the failures of Obamacare aren't suffering enough for the Obama administration to feel like it actually has to help them. But that isn't the case. Yesterday's New York Times offered up a great article about a 45-year-old child health care worker who has been shut out of the market for years, and after watching her husband, a born-again Christian, lose his job and fall ill on a government program for which he had worked for years, now has less than $10,000 to her name and is forced to leave her home. Sure, there is money for the President and for his wife, but this woman's family? According to the Times' reporters, it's worse than that. Holly Kahing and Joseph Tanfani report: Her husband, a born-again Christian, lost his job in 2003, leaving the family with no health insurance. But on Obamacare's health care exchanges, they were barred from buying insurance through her husband's job at a Miami-Dade outpatient clinic and prevented from getting financial assistance to pay for it, even though they qualify. Now she is struggling to cover their children
